We have conflicting obligations: To follow the laws of our democracy, but also to protect the global common good and the state of the planet that future generations must live on. This is where the question of civil disobedience comes in. At what point do citizens have the right to violate the law in order to avert or reduce global climate change? The six events in this interdisciplinary lecture series will explore this difficult question.