Course Description:
How have women been pictured in literature, history, theatre and film with regards to their role, their involvement and contribution to a cause, or a struggle? What are the continuities and discontinuities in their depictions during wartime, in different historical, cultural and social contexts? How have women’s identities and ideologies been presented? This course examines the above questions, while offering an overview of the obstacles, the challenges, the victories and defeats of women as they negotiate different identities, political hierarchies and systems in their quests for peace, recognition and equality. The course begins by presenting portrayals of women from the city-states of ancient Greece, and then proceeds by comparing and contrasting the evolution of causes and depictions of individuals and collectives in different states, leading up to present day legacies of 20th c. wars; women in the army and the new opportunities and challenges they face. Historical context will be provided in class, by Professor Gerolymatos (Hellenic Studies).
