Course Description:
This course deals with (i) various frameworks for studying labour market in Canada; (ii) the phenomena of precarious employment and its manifestations at multi-levels; and (iii) workers’ experiences--all genders--in both public and private sectors in Canada. Using an interdisciplinary framework and critical literature, this course also examines the interdependence of women’s labour—both paid and unpaid—and family life. The course evaluates the quality of work and jobs women do in Canada, and looks at inequalities and differences, which intersect with differences in wages and the quality of employment. The course assesses the role and significance of the labour union and its challenges in attempting to organize workers irrespective of gender, class, sexuality, age, dis/ability, race, and citizenship.

Educational Goals:
The goal of this course is to learn what constitutes labour—paid, unpaid, and volunteer—in relation to the production and reproduction processes and how to achieve family and all forms of care-work integration.
