On August 24, 2011, readers from the American-based blog Atlas Shrugs.com traveled to Israel to commemorate the 2007 murder of the Canadian teenager Aqsa Parvez. They dedicated the “Aqsa Parvez Memorial Grove” in Jerusalem’s American Independence Park to victims of honor killing across the world. According to its organizers, this event sent a message to the “Islamic world” that acts of violence leading to the murder of women – also known as honour crimes – will not be tolerated in Western nation-states. How does the narrative of a murder of a Muslim female teenager travel from Canada to Israel? What are the discourses that sanction its transfer, narration, and scripting? And how do they compromise the subjects they purportedly seek to rescue, save, or rebury? This paper explores how the body of a murdered Muslim female teenager has been used to bolster neoconservative agendas in Canada and the United States, while simultaneously rejuvenating the settler colonial project of Zionism in Israel.
