Sectarian civil war in Iraq and Syria, an overt war of intervention in Yemen, continuing anarchy in Libya, repression in Bahrein and Egypt; jihadi terrorism across the entire region and intermittently striking Europe; hundreds of thousands of casualties of terrible violence; millions of refugees and of internally displaced persons; thousands of migrants trying each week to enter Europe illegally from the Mediterranean’s southern and eastern shores: the evidence of extreme human insecurity, of an ideological and cultural regression and of a degradation of the state-society relationship in the Middle East and North Africa is plain to see.

This lecture will consider the role of the Western powers in contributing to this state of affairs and will argue that a change of policy would be not only salutary for the countries of the MENA region but also in the Western interest.

6PM Thursday
September 24, 2015
Simon Fraser University
Harbour Centre Campus, Room 1400
515 West Hastings Street, Vancouver

Sectarian civil war in Iraq and Syria, an overt war of intervention in Yemen, continuing anarchy in Libya, repression in Bahrein and Egypt; jihadi terrorism across the entire region and intermittently striking Europe; hundreds of thousands of casualties of terrible violence; millions of refugees and of internally displaced persons; thousands of migrants trying each week to enter Europe illegally from the Mediterranean’s southern and eastern shores: the evidence of extreme human insecurity, of an ideological and cultural regression and of a degradation of the state-society relationship in the Middle East and North Africa is plain to see. This lecture will consider the role of the Western powers in contributing to this state of affairs and will argue that a change of policy would be not only salutary for the countries of the MENA region but also in the Western interest.