The women's movement was one of the most important societal changes of all time, a real revolution in fact. Now that women have gained at least full legal equality and have surged into every field closed to them in the past, is there still the need for a "women's perspective"? Maude Barlow will argue that there is still a need for Canadian women’s stewardship and that women need to take what they learned from this powerful movement to tackle the major issues of our time - environmental devastation; growing income inequality between countries and inside them; extremism and ethnic violence; and the growing militarization of our world. Maude promises a challenging & lively evening.
