ARGUMENTS IN SUPPORT OF THE PROPOSED CHANGES:

[NOTE: The arguments are given under the same numbering system as the changes proposed.]

1. In terms of student interest, the availability of faculty, and the fields in which Ph.D. examinations will be offered, these two courses, Economics 838-5 and 853-5, should be offered regularly. This will be noted in the calendar by starring these courses to indicate that they will be normally offered at least once a year.
2. It is proposed to drop the two courses, Economics 831-5 and 832-5, from the starred list since these courses are not required for any of the areas in which field examinations will be given. The courses will be offered as student interest and faculty availability permit.
3. The courses listed in this item, Economics 802-5, 803-5, 804-5, 864-5, and 893-5, have rarely, if ever, been offered. The purpose of this recommendation is to remove from the list of calendar offerings courses which are unlikely to be offered in the future and in which the Department does not have any special teaching competence. Should special circumstances and student interest dictate, some of the areas covered by the courses which are to be dropped will be offered.
4. The fields should be dropped since the Department does not have the faculty resources to cover these two fields adequately.
5. The proposed change permits a greater degree of flexibility in scheduling the programs of M.A. candidates in Economics. Present requirement reads that students are required to take Economics 800-5 and 805-5 in addition to demonstrating competence in Analytical Economics and Quantitative Methods. This has occasionally created difficulty, in terms of the students being able to take both of the required courses during their normal period of study towards the M.A. degree, since the courses are usually offered only once a year. At the same time, some students have been exempted from one or both of the required courses since they have previously taken comparable work elsewhere. By expanding the "choice" of required courses, students will be able to:
 - (a) meet their requirements during a normal three semester sequence regardless of when they start their work at Simon Fraser, and
 - (b) will be required to take some Theory work at Simon Fraser since Economics 801-5 and 806-5 are more advanced courses than the two presently required.
