COMMUNICATIONS 455: Intermediate Technology and Development

The course will analyze from a communications perspective what are generally referred to as "problems of development". Topics will include the

- 1) assumptions and consequences of past approaches to communications and development,
- 2) the role of communications in the ever present tension between the a) maintenance of traditional cultures and b) adaptation to modern industrial society
- 3) the evaluation and design of communications systems from the perspective of maintaining traditions and/or facilitating change.

We will deal with problems of cross-cultural communications, the role of traditional values and social organization and the transformation of these patterns attendant on the introduction of both "high" and "intermediate" technologies.

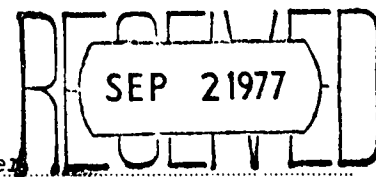

The course will focus on the analysis of the problems of development for two specific groups: native people of the B.C. coast and the Polynesians of the Cook Islands.

A reading list will be provided at the beginning of the semester. A paper will be required, together with seminar presentation in class of discussion topics from the readings.

Seminar: Monday 1:30 - 4:40
