PROPOSED MINOR IN INTERNATIONAL AND GLOBAL EDUCATION

Overview

SFU has expressed a commitment to the internationalization of its academic programs in all of its faculties. The Faculty of Education is likewise committed to being actively involved in internationalizing its four program areas. To enhance the Faculty of Education's participation in this internationalization process, Undergraduate Programs wishes to establish a Minor in International and Global Education. With the opportunities for students to now receive a B.Ed. as a second degree, there has been a growing interest by students to enroll in an education minor given that an education minor is required for a B.Ed. The development of a Minor in International and Global Education would be of value to prospective and current teachers wanting to teach both in international and Canadian settings.

The goal of the International and Global Education Minor is to provide a focus that will help teachers to foster learning environments in which students are actively engaged in developing an understanding of, and a responsibility for, promoting positive interdependent relationships on local, national and global levels so that individually and collectively world citizens can increasingly be participants in a socially just and equitable world. By actively dealing with issues arising out of the interdependent action among various political, economic, cultural, technological and social systems; participants analyze alternatives, make decisions and by so doing enhance their sense of empowerment. In this process students form and question their international and global perspective. International and Global Education is, therefore, a holistic approach which endeavours to infuse a global perspective in the creation and implementation of curriculum experiences.

Listed below are definitions of international and global education drawn from the literature:

International education includes the study of relations among nations, particular regions of the world, foreign languages and cultures, comparative and international approaches to particular disciplines, and the examination of issues affecting more than one country (Pickert 1992:20).

Global education is teaching and learning with a global perspective:

- Recognizing the interdependence and interconnections of issues, regions, peoples, places, systems and themes;
- Infusing global issues, such as sustainable development, environmental care, peace and human rights, into traditional subject areas;
- Working toward active, responsible global citizenship building a more peaceful, just and sustainable world (Copumantarakis, Defining Global Education, 2002)

Within education in general, there has been a growing interest in International and Global Education as indicated, for example, by the expressed strong interest of students applying to the International Teacher Education Module (currently about 10% of PDP applicants); student participation in short term international placements (summer 2004-29 participants); the demand for SFU education graduates by international school boards; the interest in attracting international teachers by B.C. school boards; the development of graduate programs in Global Education at other institutions (e.g. OISE; the increased use of the Canadian curriculum for international schools; the focus of the BCTF (BC Teachers Federation) Peace and Global Education as a specialist association; and the proposed BCTF 2006 summer institute on Global Education.

Therefore, this Minor would be of interest to the following people:

- Pre-service elementary and secondary teachers interested in infusing a global perspective in any of the school subject areas
- Pre-PDP students taking courses towards an education minor in preparation for entering PDP
- Students interested in a B.Ed. as a second degree
- ITEM participants in PDP
- Post Baccalaureate Diploma teachers interested in Global Education
- Preservice and inservice teachers from international teacher education faculties or universities
