Course Description

"Justice is the first virtue of social institutions, as truth is of systems of thought."
(Rawls) "...the final causes of all social changes and political revolutions are to be sought, not in men's brains, not in men's better insights into eternal truth and justice, but in changes in the modes of production and exchange." (Engels) "Man is above all else mind, consciousness—that is, he is a product of history, not of nature."
(Gramsci) "The condition of possibility for deconstruction is a call for justice."
(Derrida) "Democracy depends on the belief of the people that there is some scope left for collectively shaping a challenging future." (Habermas) "Global social injustice is intimately linked to global cognitive injustice." (de Souza Santos)

This course uses the lens of justice to examine the relationship between communication and the global. In the first half of the course we will examine justice in terms of the epistemological question of how to know the global. Here we will consider various differing visions of the relationship between reason and justice—idealization, critical historicism, constructivist reason, situated logics and embodiment—and ask whether and how ways of knowing and communicating shape global justice. In the second half of the course we will reflect on how knowing the global is a question of justice by considering the structures (financial management, international organization(s), protest movements) and issues (climate, health, movement of people) that shape our global, mediated reality.
